

SOCIAL ISSUES

The social issues confronting a community and how they are perceived and handled reveal much of a community's character and values. Most of the titles in this section are reports of studies conducted within the last thirty years. These studies examine the city from various viewpoints, including religious, ethnic and economic, and deal with many special issues, such as elder abuse, the impact of the Massachusetts Turnpike on Newton citizens, policing and recreation. This section also contains a limited number of essays written on social issues by prominent local figures.

N 305.23 A18A COMPACT SHELVING

Action for Children's Television (ACT), a national grassroots organization, was founded in 1968 in Newton to improve the quality of television programming for children and later worked to regulate advertising to children. It was responsible for many cases brought against the FCC, and their main achievement was the passage of the Children's Television Act of 1990. The organization was disbanded shortly afterward. The material in this collection relates to ACT's efforts to analyze advertising in children's programs, to condemn the marketing of sugary foods and misleading vitamin ads to children, and their receipt of a John and Mary Markle Foundation grant. Collection consists of newspaper articles and computer printouts.

N 305.26 K72A 2009 COMPACT SHELVING

This research explored "aging in place" among women age 65 and older living in Newton, Massachusetts. Study goals were to understand: the "places" that comprise the environment of "aging in place"; the factors that enable "aging in place"; "aging in place" in a suburb; and to refine definitions of "aging in place" Interviews with women used open-ended questions about women's early years in Newton and the changes they experienced in personal status, and places over time. Themes emerged using modified grounded theory with inductive and deductive approaches, and which acknowledged "sensitizing concepts"....Findings can be used to encourage individuals, families, and providers to consider the complexity of "aging in place" and the total environment of elders as they plan for the future. Conversations about "aging in place" must challenge the implication that "aging in place" is negative and static, and emphasize its positive, dynamic qualities. “This dissertations exams the roles of ethnic identity, community-building, and interethnic stratification in the adaptation process of Irish Catholic immigrants in Newton Massachusetts ---. The study focuses on the Cathoic church as a mediating institution between the immigrant and host communities. It is argued that Irish-born and American-born Irish constructed an ethnic community to counter the negative social definitions of them helpd by the town’s Anglo-Protestants.” From the Abstract to the dissertation.

Voice of Women (VOW) was a Newton, Massachusetts based nuclear disarmament organization formed in 1960 which continued through the Vietnam War and beyond. Its members conducted teach-ins, sit-ins and protest demonstrations in Newton and the Boston area. It ran the Peace Boutique, which sold peace paraphernalia, then became a craft and gift shop and meeting place for peace supporters. Even after the peak of activity in the 1960s and 1970s the women continued their involvement in peace, civil rights, and protest against atmospheric nuclear testing. Around 2000 an effort was made by the Newton2000 History Committee, the City of Newton Women's Commission and VOW members to collect oral history about the women in the organization. This collection includes videotaped interviews of members and an introductory history of the movement. It also includes papers related to the VOW Oral History Project-programs honoring VOW members, fundraising sources, publicity covering the renewed interest in Newton's historical involvement in peace activism and the role of women.

Collection consists of eight VHS videotapes of interviews made with the help of oral historian and videographer Ann Smith, photographs of group members in 2001-2002, flyer, newspaper articles, chronology of the group's activities, 1971-1972, history of the group with bibliography and reference sources, individual biographical sheets on members and interview summaries of Voice of Women Oral History Project, Boston College May 2002 doctoral dissertation by Suzanne Kelley McCormack on antiwar activities in the Vietnam era, finding aid for Voice of Women-New England's donation of organization records, 1961-1998 to the Schlesinger Library at Radcliffe College, information sheets on grants solicited by the Voice of Women Oral History Project.

Newton Free Library. NONANTUM ("THE LAKE") AND THE LANGUAGE OF THE LAKE, 1972-1979. 11 items.

N 427.09 N73N COMPACT SHELVING

Newton's Nonantum Village is historically known as "The Lake," with its own special, local jargon. Originally occupying the area around Silver Lake, (a lake filled in and paved over due to toxic waste from an adjacent mill) were locals who created a language from a mixture of Italian, English, Romany, and street language. Their slang allowed them to speak in code as a community. One local, Alan Flynn, Supervisor of Custodians at The Newton Free Library, was called upon to act as a consultant on this "Lake" language, developed primarily over the years from the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s. Flynn grew up in "The Lake" and was an ideal resource for former Oak Hill resident Steven Drukman, playwright and director of "The Prince of Atlantis," a ninety minute play set in Nonantum with its mixture of Italian-Americans, Irish-Americans, and French-

Canadians. Drukman wanted to ensure the authenticity of the dialogue of his characters as well as the dialects pronounced by the actors. Alan Flynn reviewed the script, checking for inaccuracies, making changes, and adding words. Flynn grew up in Nonantum in the 1960s and gave Drukman an historically informed tour. He also video-chatted with the actors, coaching them on dialects and accents specific to Nonantum, and others specific to Boston.
