

HOSPITAL AND HEALTH

In 1886 Newton's first hospital, the Cottage Hospital, was dedicated. In 1894 the name was changed to the Newton Hospital, which it remained until 1945, when its present name, the Newton-Wellesley Hospital was adopted to reflect its broadened scope of service.

In 1997 the Massachusetts Department of Public Health evaluated the incidence of breast cancer in Newton for the years 1982-1992. Detailed information on both the hospital and the incidence of breast cancer, as well as other health issues, are found through the books, pamphlets and newspaper articles in the Newton Collection or at the Newton-Wellesley Hospital web site www.nwh.org.

An appeal to the citizens of Newton, Wellesley and surrounding towns for their help in building suitable living and teaching quarters for nurses in order to give them adequate facilities for learning, rest and relaxation. Pictures show crowded laboratory and classrooms housed in basements with poor ventilation and artificial lighting. The statement under the aerial view of the hospital sums up the situation: "Twenty-four buildings make up the hospital group, ranging from the magnificently modern main hospital building to the portable shacks now occupied as sleeping quarter by non-professional employees."

"Data published by the Massachusetts Cancer Registry for the period 1982-1990 indicated that Newton experienced an excess in breast cancer cases that was statistically significant in comparison to the number of cases expected based on statewide rates of breast cancer (MDPH, 1993)." In response, Senator Lois Pines requested further investigation in Newton, which resulted in this evaluation. The evaluation is descriptive in nature and provides a comparison of the incidence of breast cancer in Newton with the incidence of breast cancer in the state.
